

Political economy in conflict resolution: the Israeli-Palestinian case

MAY 2019

AMIT LOEWENTHAL, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC POLICY DR. SAMI MIAARI, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR STUDIES

Our challenges

Conflict resolution

Post resolution stability

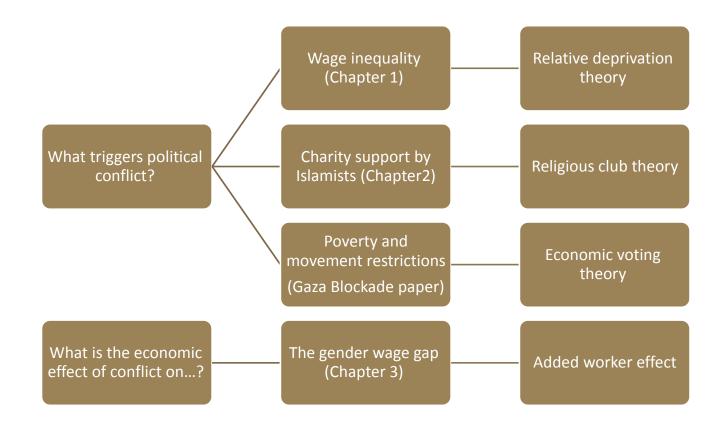

Policy-oriented research

What triggers political conflict?

Successful conflict resolution

What are the economic consequences?

Successful and stable rebuilding

Political economy in service of conflict resolution – our research plan

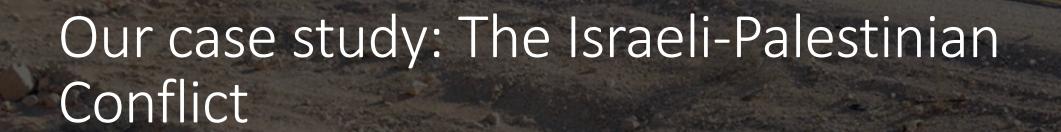

Contribution and importance

Better understanding of the causes and consequences of conflicts

Findings will provide insights on policies for conflict prevention, conflict resolution, and post-conflict rehabilitation

Many aspect of our research have never been studied on this level!

- Inequality and conflict (no studies on the country level)
- Conflict and gender wage gap (most studies focus on employment)

One of the longest lasting political conflicts

Local and global importance

High quality data is available

Data sources on the West Bank and Gaza

Public opinion

PCPSR public opinion surveys

Socio-economic conditions

 PCBS Palestinian labor force and households surveys

Political violence

- B'Tselem fatalities data
- UN OCHA mobility restrictions data

Advanced econometric analysis

Methodology

Effects are identified using variation across time and regions

"Natural experiments" and pair matching algorithms are used to establish causality

Preliminary results

Palestinians living in relatively well-off districts are likelier to support "moderate" factions (Fatah)

Evidence that the blockade moved Gazan public opinion from moderate factions towards "Radical" Factions (Hamas)

Displacement of men due to imprisonment triggered increased employment of women

The gender wage gap contracted during the second Intifada

Policy considerations

The importance of state-building and political reforms

Rethinking mobility restrictions in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip

Entrance of women into the labor force – an opportunity?

Thanks for listening!